The Downey Farmhouse is a large stone structure two stories tall. The stones have a stucco covering that has partially worn off. The house is five bays long by two deep. In each gable wall is a brick chimney. The facade has a central entrance and a one-story porch over the middle three bays. The roof has slate shingles and a simple box cornice. A two-story wing extends from the rear of the original structure. It is stone and has an inside end chimney.

Near the house are several small frame outbuildings and a small frame barn, all date from 19th century (except barn?).
